

D. M. Major Visits Paris, Eats Turkey

By Gordon Gammack.

(Register Staff Writer in the European War Zone.)

PARIS, FRANCE — The staff of a mechanized regiment was wrestling with a military problem and the major who is operations officer of the regiment suggested a solution to the regimental commander.

"No," said the colonel, "that's no good. You need a rest. Go to Paris for a few days and forget the war."

"Colonel, you go, too," said the major.

BREDIMUS.

And that is how Maj. Frank Bredimus of Des Moines got to have a Thanksgiving turkey dinner in Paris.

German Homes.

Bredimus has been in Germany since September. He has been amazed to find homes in Germany so well equipped.

"They were crazy to start a war," he said. "They had plenty of everything. We've found electric refrigerators in almost every home and in many of the homes there are several vacuum cleaners. They've had good food, too."

Bredimus said that many of the German people have attempted to be friendly to American troops. Frequently, he said, German families have offered food, brandy, and cigars to Americans.

Highly Optimistic.

The cavalry has been in the thick of the present offensive and Bredimus said he is highly optimistic about the chances of its complete success.

The Des Moines officer had an amusing experience in Aachen not so long ago. He was standing on a street with the regimental commander when out of a building came a man garbed in top hat, wing collar, cutaway coat, and striped trousers.

"I thought all the civilians were evacuated from this place," said the colonel, eyeing the fancily dressed man. Bredimus took a quick look at the individual.

"My gosh," he said, "he's one of my men."

The colonel was more amused than displeased.

The Des Moines Register- Des Moines, Iowa - 28 Nov 1944

Des Moines Major Visits Paris, Eats Turkey; By Gordon Gammack. (Register Staff Writer in the European War Zone) PARIS, FRANCE

The staff of a mechanized regiment was wrestling with a military problem and the major, who is operations officer of the regiment suggested a solution to the regimental commander. "No," said the colonel, "that's no good. You need a rest. Go to Paris for a few days and forget the war." "Colonel, you go, too," said BREDIMUS. the major. And that is how Maj. Frank Bredimus of Des Moines got to have a Thanksgiving turkey dinner in Paris.

German Homes. Bredimus has been in Germany since September. He has been amazed to find homes in Germany so well equipped. "They were crazy to start a war," he said. "They had plenty of everything. We've found electric refrigerators in almost every home and in many of the homes there are several vacuum cleaners. They've had good food, too." Bredimus said that many of the German people have attempted to be friendly to American troops. Frequently, he said, German families have offered food, brandy, and cigars to Americans.

Highly Optimistic. The cavalry has been in the thick of the present offensive and Bredimus said he is highly optimistic about the chances of its complete success. The Des Moines officer had an amusing experience in Aachen not so long ago. He was standing on a street with the regimental commander when out of a building came a man garbed in a top hat, wing collar, cutaway coat, and striped trousers. "I thought all the civilians were evacuated from this place," said the colonel, eyeing the fancily dressed man. Bredimus took a quick look at the individual. "My gosh," he said, "he's one of my men." The colonel was more amused than displeased.